Professor Pam Christie is one of the most influential academics in the area of education, social justice and teaching and learning in schools and higher education in South Africa and globally. Her work has been cited by almost every scholar working in the area of education in the country, which is a testament to the calibre of her work. She is an Emeritus Professor at the University of Cape Town and Visiting Professor in the Centre for Rights and Transformation at the University of Johannesburg. Working in both South Africa and Australia, Pam has taught and published widely in the areas of sociology of education, education policy, school organisation and change, and classroom practice. She has a long-standing interest in education for social justice. Her recent work on decolonisation has culminated in a deeper understanding of a very complex area of research, expanding the discourse, but also making it palatable to young and emerging scholars.
